Twelve years ago! How strangely times. Have altered, since together. We listened to the village chimes. Out there among the heather. We listened, after church, on Sunday, Careless of colds and Mrs. Grundy.

And, oh that day, that glorious day
When, floating down the river,
While Cookham Lock behind as lay,
We plighted troth for ever.
The Inlare, and still more the present,
To us just then seemed not unpleasant,

Sweet Ethel! Still I seem to see, (Alas I tis only seeming)
That golden head quite close to me,
Those tender, dark eyes beaming.
The lips, from which came, soft and low,
The nurmered "Yes," twelve years ago.

And then, why did we pause so long ?—
I know I loved you dearly
In those old days; how things went wrong,

I can't remember clearly. Ve loved, and yet somehow we tarried, Till both got tired, and you got—married. Ah well! I'll put the tress away,

Ah well! I'll put the tree.

In this old escritoire;
Last time we met your hair was grey,
And now—we meet no more.

Above your grave the grasses mingle,
And I am forty, fat, and single.

CLEMENT DATKE.

The Ejectment.

The dusty road is fringed with green; The hedges shelter from the heat; ove the woodbines blossom sweet; w, the toiling ant is seen.

And in the hedge, that rises high Above the tangled grass and flowers, A little bird beguiles the hours With quiet homely minstrelsy.

It sings as day is drawing nigh, Or when the idle moon is bright, Or when the purple frunge of night Is rising in the eastern sky: Scarce noticed—yet perchance its song Makes weary feet forget to ache, Or dull despair again to take Some hope and strength to toil along;

Or merely serves to bring a smile On faces never touched by care— On hearts that have not known despair, To shed a brighter joy awhile.

But use must rule: the woodman's bill Clears the green bank—the bird has fled, In other boughs to hide its head, The while its former haunt is still.

Yet hard to think another shade Can be as loved as that one, where It watched the primroses appear, The springing of each tender blide.

Another hedge may bloom more sweet, O'er richer fields be heard its strains, But sweeter than all these remains The memory of its first retreat;

And when alike the new and old Fade in the autumn, and the blast Clears the thick trees, the flowers are past, The grass is withered with the cold;

Some pity rises in the mind, To view the songster, silent now, Seek shelter from the driving snow, Or shiver in the cutting wind.

> (From The Gentleman's Magazine.) Coleridge.

It was in the summer of 1821 that I first beheld Samuel Taylor Coleridge. It was on the East Cliff at Ramsgate. He was contemplating the sea under its most attractive aspect: in a dazzling sun, with sailing clouds that drew their purple shadows over its bright green floor, and a merry breeze of sufficient prevalence to emboss each wave with a silvery foam. He might Minister was not the object of his invective possibly have composed upon the occasion at the time of his composing that famous one of the most philosophical, and at the same time most enchanting, of his fugitive reflections, which he has entitled "Youth and Age; "for in it he speaks of "airy cliffs and glittering sands," and-

Of those trim skiffs, unknown of yore, On winding lakes and rivers wide, That ask no aid of sail or oar, That fear no spite of wind or tide.

As he had no companion, I desired to pay my respects to one of the most extraordi nary-and, indeed, in his department of geniss, the most extraordinary - man of his age. And being possessed of a talisman for securing his consideration, I introduced myself as a friend and admirer of Charles Lamb. This pass-word was sufficient, and I found him immediately talking to me in the bland and frank tones of a standing acquaintance. A poor girl had that morning thrown herself from the pierhead in a pang of despair, from having been betrayed by a villain. He alluded to the event, and went on to denounce the morality of the age that will bound from the community the reputed weaker subject, and continue to receive him who has wronged her. He agreed with me that that question never will be adjusted but by that question never will be adjusted will con-tinue in abeyance so long as they visit with severity the errors of their own sex and tolerate those of ours. He then diverged to the great mysteries of life and death, and branched away to the sublimer question - the immortality of the soul. Here he spread the sail-broad vans of his wonderful imagination, and soared away with an eagle-flight, and with an eagle eye too, compassing the effulgence of his great gument, ever and anon stooning own sparrow's range, and away again, and careering through the trackless fields of etherial metaphysics. And thus he continued for an hour and a half, never pausing for an instant except to eatch his breath (which, in the heat of his teeming mind, he did like a schoolboy repeating by rote his task), and gave utter-ance to some of the grandest thoughts I ever heard from the mouth of a man. His ideas, embodied in words of purest eloquence, flew about my ears like drifts of snow. He was like a cataract filling and rushing over my penny-phial capacity. I could only gasp and bow my head in acknowledgement. He required from me nothing more than the simple recognition of his discourse; and so he went on like a steam engine—I keeping the machine oiled with my looks of pleasure, while he supplied the fuel: and that, upon the same theme too, would have lasted till now. What would I have given for a short-hand report of that speech! And such was the habit of this wouderful man. Like the old peripatetic philosophers he walked about prodigally scattering wisdom, and leaving it to the winds of chance to waft the seeds into a genial soil.

My first suspicion of his being at Ramsgate had arisen from my mother observing that she had heard an elderly gentleman in the public library, who looked like into a genial soil. a dissenting minister, talking as she never heard man talk. Like his own "Ancient Mariner, "when he had once fixed your eye he held you spell-bound, and you were constrained to listen to his tale; you must have been more powerful than he to have have been more powerful than he to have broken the charm; and I know no man of pure gelatine, secreted by a species of worthy to do that. He did indeed answer

CHALMERS-SPENCE 'AIR SPACE.' AND FOWLER'S

YUCCA BOILER COVERING Patented January 19, 1866. Has been victorious over all other devices for cerestas bollers with which it has been brought into competition, both in Europe and America, for the past twelve years. Endorsed by the Scientific American and London Engineering everywhere as being the best Nea-conductor, the most lightable, the most Economical.

THE AIR SPACE The "Air Space" has mechanical device. The end method of covering boilers, steam and other hot pipes was to smear a coaling of plaster over the boilers are pipes, and directly in contact with the hot surfaces. Common sense teaches that any compound thus applies will soon have the life burnt out of it, and that the expansion and contraction of the metal over which it is ameared, will cause it to loosen and crack, so that will, after a time, fail off. Besides this, experience he proved that the line and other compounds used for the
